

Big Screen Televisions

Contributed by Hank Whitsell
Tuesday, 20 June 2006
Last Updated Friday, 28 July 2006

Big screen televisions are altars to 21st century middle class life in a post industrial culture. While it may seem strange or extreme to some people, I find myself performing religious rituals in front of my big screen television on a regular basis. While my girlfriend never seems to understand, my neighbors sometimes do, and they will occasionally join me in one of these religious ceremonies and enjoy watching especially on a live singing competitions which they requested me to turn on to that channel. These big screen television religious ceremonies are also sometimes referred to as "game days", and are also sometimes more specifically known as The World Series and the Super Bowl. Any sports fan will know the kind of ceremonies I'm referring to. Big screen televisions also make being a movie fan a sheer joy as well. With a 5.1 surround sound set up or better, a big screen television can make watching movies at home almost as good as the theatre. In some ways a lot better, because you don't have to wait in line, pay $10.50, and then watch a half an hour of loud and obnoxious ads and previews. The big screen television is the center piece in a home entertainment system. Because of the newer television technologies, like LCD and plasma TVs, you can often find big screen televisions of the older CRT type for very reasonable prices now. Of course, trying to move a big screen television of the CRT variety is a major hassle, and its almost worth the extra money just for the convenience of a flat screen. The flat big screen televisions are steadily dropping in price, but are still quite expensive. However, if you are an avid TV user, it may well be worth the dough. HDTV capable, easier to move around, and with an awesome picture quality, I'm keeping a close eye on these televisions and waiting for a deal good enough to jump on. All of your favorite television shows seem somehow a lot better when you're watching them on a big screen television. If you're still using a middle size or small TV, I definitely recommend looking into getting a big screen television. Even if you don't use it that often, they generally last forever, and you'll never regret having spent the money on one. A big screen television, even unused, just makes a living room look somehow better; more modern. If for no other reason, get a big screen television just because it looks cool.